4. Starting your image editing. The first step to using any image editing program is to open the file. If you've stored the image in the same folder on your system as the _.psd_ file, you can open the file right away. However, most people keep their images on an external hard drive, so first you need to open the image. On a Mac, open your image in the Finder, and then find your image on the hard drive and drag it into Photoshop. As you open your image, you should see a large preview of your image. Right-click the image and select Open As from the menu that appears. In the Open dialog box (refer to Figure 4-2), you'll see that the _.psd_ file now appears as an icon. You can select it and open it. It may take a while for it to open. FIGURE 4-2: You can save your image from the Finder and open it right away. On a Windows system, open the file with Windows Explorer and select the right-click and Open As shortcut from the menu that appears. In the folder where you stored your image, right-click the _.psd_ file and select Open in Photoshop from the shortcut menu that appears. The image should open immediately. 5. Save your edited image. When you're finished, save your image with an appropriate file name. Choose File⇒Save or press Ctrl+S to automatically save your image in the current location. Choose File⇒Save As, navigate to the folder where you stored your image, and choose the appropriate file name. Then click Save. Think of Photoshop as a blank canvas — it's the medium you use to create and modify images.

This deregulatory change will allow the federal government to more effectively prosecute companies that engage in discrimination, and protect consumers' access to the Internet and other communications services. Today's vote follows a similar action by the FCC in December. "Title II gives the FCC the tools it needs to put the powerful engines of competition and innovation at the service of the American people," said Michelle K. White, President and CEO of the Commercial Internet Exchange Association. "Now more than ever, consumers are demanding alternatives to cable companies, and the Internet is a major driver of innovation, economic growth and job creation. The United States should take the lead in promoting investment in the foundational technology of our economy and in the online ecosystem, which is essential to our continued success as a competitive and innovative economy." "Today's vote marks a victory for the openness and freedom of information in our communications, and it is an immense relief to companies like mine to see the Internet classified and regulated as a public utility," said Tom Pahl, CEO of Virgile. "It is critical for the United States to be the best place to start and operate an Internet business." "Today's vote is a major victory for the American economy," said Craig Aaron, President and CEO of Free Press. "By making sure that the Internet operates as a public utility, the FCC has recognized that the Internet is simply an extension of our communications infrastructure, and we have a fundamental responsibility to treat it as such. It is a victory for consumers and free markets that will enable us to rebuild online infrastructure in the public interest and expand competition and choice. This is a step that will ensure that all Americans have access to the Internet and the communications services it offers without discrimination." "Today's vote is a bold victory for our economic recovery and for American consumers," said R. Michael Smith, President and CEO of the Consumer Technology Association. "It also underscores the long-range importance of a pro-competition policy framework for the health of the Internet and the innovation economy as a whole. We congratulate the FCC for taking such a decisive step in advancing that policy framework." "The FCC's decision has huge implications for the telecommunications industry, its
