Use GoWatchIt to discover, consume, or bookmark everything you want to watch!Q: How do I convert System.String to System.IO.TextWriter? I'm trying to create a simple console app with a few text files for practice, but I'm having trouble converting a string to an object. Simple example: Console.WriteLine("Title: {0}", title); This converts string to object fine, but I'm not sure how to get it to work with a text file. A: System.IO.TextWriter is a type in System.IO namespace. The type you're using, System.String, is a class from System.Runtime namespace. So, you want to change: Console.WriteLine("Title: {0}", title); to: Console.WriteLine("Title: {0}", System.IO.File.ReadLines("somefile.txt")[1]); You could try this: Console.WriteLine("Title: {0}", System.IO.File.ReadLines("somefile.txt")[1]); But this won't give any feedback if the file doesn't exist, which you may not want. To throw an exception for that, you can do: Console.WriteLine("Title: {0}", string.IsNullOrEmpty(System.IO.File.ReadLines("somefile.txt")))?

Monitoring of intracellular free calcium concentration with aequorin in rodent neuroblastoma cells. Induction of cell death is one of the most important outcomes of gene therapy mediated by recombinant adenovirus (rAd). In addition to the major therapeutic efficacy, the success of adenovirus-based gene therapy largely depends on the efficacy and safety of the recombinant virus. To successfully develop this type of therapy, the optimal dose of the virus and duration of viral infection should be determined to achieve maximum therapeutic efficacy without unacceptable toxicity.
