Photo : Getty We've reached a consensus, dear reader. Everyone knows that the best way to get the very best coffee on planes is by flying with United, which some of us have every day. The only downside to the chain of overpriced service? The fees for these glorified grocery bags of caffeine. It's a big industry. United rakes in $30,000 per aircraft on domestic flights, and these fees are only going to rise. Below, we've detailed exactly how United charges you for everything, from checking in to getting your bags to bringing in your bag when you're done with it. What are the prices for each service, and how do they compare to other airlines? Check-in Depending on how and where you're flying, the usual check-in fee is $45 per person (or $25 if you're flying on a low-cost carrier). If you're paying with your phone, it's another $20. The minimum fee is $15 (and it never drops below that), and because the airline appears to include an additional 5 percent charge for domestic flights, the maximum price tag for a domestic flight is $150. Aside from United, JetBlue charges $20. Southwest charges $10. Southwest also charges $5 per bag. Airport drop-off United charges $75 for your bags, with a free maximum of four bags per flight. Delta charges $75 for your bags as well, and $25 for the maximum four bags on a flight. Other airlines carry a combination of fees and discounts. For example, JetBlue charges $125, but offers a flat rate of $25 for bags up to eight. Express check-in Express check-in (which, for the record, is not the same thing as express boarding) is available for $15 per person. If you're flying on United Express, the fee is waived. Airline fees vary. Delta gives a first-class express check-in for $30; Southwest charges $40 for a first-class fare. Airport checked bags The flight attendant will usually charge between $25 and $45 per bag, with no hard limit. "Oh, and there's no limit," is
