Hurd talks about the reality of being a fugitive from justice The front door of Randy's home opened and the 30-year-old jailbird was released. It took only a few minutes before Randy walked over to me and waved, as if to say "we did it, we got him." I was still in disbelief from his arrest in July 2008. He admitted to me later that he had planned on escaping the moment he was indicted in 2001. However, he discovered that the U.S. Marshal's service was still watching him, having been tipped by an informant. He told me he had planned to run away from them, too. I asked him, "how could you just lie and say you intended to escape?" He said, "I had no other choice. I couldn't get a fair trial in front of those people, and just saying I was going to escape would have been stupid." I knew my source was not "just a hustler" and that he always did the right thing, so I decided to trust him. Over the next few years I learned that Randy was a model citizen who volunteered to help the elderly and abused children, and was a caring husband and father. I decided to leave Randy alone and not bother him anymore, telling him that he had already had his day in court, that he should now leave it alone, since the system had given him justice. Still, he wrote me a letter several months ago and asked me to write an article about his experiences on the run from the Feds. I was hesitant at first because I couldn't get Randy to agree to have me visit him. He wanted to distance himself from me and get on with his life. When he told me why, I understood. "I'm not supposed to be doing this interview with you! You went after me! After all the things we tried to work out, you decided to bring me back to court

As other predictors such as income or perceived health limitations, U.S. health care expenditures per capita are more influenced by inequality in wealth than in Germany or the Netherlands, where health care expenditures are more influenced by income and other health measures. Future studies are needed that address how inequality in wealth influences social welfare from a common goods perspective.Thursday, September 11, 2012 Almost three years ago, Jessica started an internship at the High Line in New York City. At the time, I had just returned to the city after living in London for eight years. I quickly came to feel at home on the High Line, a long, winding, and amazingly beautiful elevated park that runs through the center of Manhattan. I've been back to the High Line for walk breaks on three occasions since the moment I came back home, always guided by my muse, Jessica, who continues her internship with the park. On each of these walks, I try to figure out why the High Line is such a pleasurable experience for me. If you've walked on the High Line recently, you know that since its opening in May 2009, it has become a major destination. But I've never been able to accurately define why that is. I got the same answer recently at a bar overlooking the High Line, where I ran into a friend from the time I spent on the High Line. "I think people
