NASA, responding to a subpoena in a lawsuit filed by the House of Representatives, turned over documents related to its 2018 budget plan for the Trump administration. Photo courtesy of NASA The House Science Committee led by Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas) subpoenaed the space agency to provide documents related to a report on the Trump administration's proposal for NASA's budget that was released in January. As the space agency's six-year plan for 2018-2023, the report calls for reducing the agency's funding by 31 percent, while the Trump administration proposed a budget that would eliminate the agency's earth science programs and drastically cut the number of new missions that it would propose. "NASA's request for document production here is simply routine," Rep. Smith said. "The American people have a right to know whether the agency is following the president's commitment to space exploration and human exploration and whether Administrator Bridenstine is exercising his independent judgment on the president's priorities." Smith first sent a letter to NASA's Administrator Jim Bridenstine on May 20, demanding documents related to the report. NASA turned d0c515b9f4
