Jazz at the Bite of Oregon
In this age of technology, I was surprised to discover that so many Oregonians and visitors to Portland have never experienced live jazz. Jazz at the Bite of Oregon is a fun way for Portlanders and visitors to experience, or rediscover, live jazz. In 2011, a nonprofit organization called the Northwest Jazz Forum began sponsoring jazz performances at local restaurants, in order to introduce Portlanders to this unique but often overlooked form of music.

This year, Jazz at the Bite of Oregon expanded to five new venues in the metro area. Each night, a different live jazz group performs for a sold-out crowd. One show has a wonderful blend of styles, the other is all traditional. There's something to appeal to everybody. The musicians are great, too. Jazz fans I talked to at the event also liked the reduced price of $20 to attend, especially when compared to a concert at the Oregonian Center for the Performing Arts. For that price, you get to hear live jazz, see the beautiful Portland skyline, and savor such foods as Don Ho's spaghetti, spiced pulled chicken, fried oyster deviled eggs, and sesame chicken in black bean sauce. The venue where I heard the flavor of jazz, Kismet Iraqi Cuisine, is located in the northwest part of Portland. I know that area of the city well, because I visit it often. It took me awhile to find the restaurant, because there are some unusual places in there. The block is nearly abandoned, one-story commercial buildings with windows boarded up, metal doorways covered with graffiti and plywood. One building has a sign on its top reading, “Bastards.” Another has painted on its exterior, “Howzit.” I wondered, What kind of mad scientists live in this neighborhood? The Northwest Jazz Forum plans to expand its concerts to Kismet in 2013. The Taste of Soul Food I've visited Kismet before, but that was back in 2008. The last time I stopped by, there was a sign on the door saying the restaurant would be closed for two weeks for renovations, scheduled to be completed by mid-June. The restaurant is still owned by the same family and they have retained the traditional Iraqi motifs they brought with them when they arrived in Portland in the 1970s. Their menu features some items you
