This invention relates to an apparatus for controlling the hardness of the surface of a camshaft in an internal combustion engine, and more particularly to an apparatus which can be applied to maintain the surface hardness of the camshaft to a desired optimum hardness during use of the camshaft and in response to any deterioration in the hardness of the surface of the camshaft. In an internal combustion engine, it is necessary to provide wear resistant surfaces for the camshaft and other cam and lifter components, such as the rocker shaft. This wear resistance is generally achieved by lapping or polishing the cams, rocker arms and other components. It is well known that the wear resistance of the camshaft components and therefore the lifespan of the engine can be increased by maintaining the hardness of the camshaft surface to a desired hardness. Typically, the hardness of the camshaft surface is normally maintained at a predetermined value by lapping the cams after the engine is assembled and periodically thereafter. Many variables are involved in determining the hardness of the surface of a camshaft, which includes the initial hardness of the surface, any degradation to the surface due to heat and wear, and any wear to the camshaft during use. In the past, the hardness of the surface of the camshaft has been conventionally maintained within a predetermined and fixed hardness range, typically between about 50 and about 1000 Vickers hardness. However, as engine efficiency has improved, the camshafts have been required to operate at higher engine speeds, and at higher engine temperatures, to achieve the same engine output. A change in the hardness of the camshaft surface alone can effectively change the efficiency of the engine, and the hardness of the camshaft surface is now required to be maintained within a greater hardness range, typically within about 150 to about 2500 Vickers hardness. If the camshaft surface hardness is maintained below the predetermined hardness range, the life of the camshaft can be greatly shortened. Typically, camshaft surfaces are lapped to the desired hardness and then checked with a dial indicator before they are removed from the machine. If the surface hardness is not within the desired hardness range, they are reheated in a lapping fixture and lap to hardness before being assembled with the engine. After a camshaft surface has been lapped, the operating temperature of the camshaft is measured. The operating temperature of a camshaft is significantly related to the hardness of the camshaft surface, so
