Integrated circuits (ICs) are commonly housed within one or more modules referred to as “packages.” Such packages commonly have one or more types of surface terminals that couple to corresponding terminals or other circuit elements of a printed circuit board (PCB) or other substrate when the package is mounted to the PCB. These terminals provide an interface between the IC and other circuit elements of the PCB. As the complexity of these ICs has increased, more and more terminals are needed, and correspondingly, more and more terminals are needed to be disposed within the package. As ICs are usually packaged before being mounted to a PCB, the number of terminals that will be used may not yet be determined. Moreover, depending on the application, the number of terminals needed in the final application may not be known at the time of IC packaging. Since such terminals are fabricated and not glued in place, it is common to have some of the terminals left unpopulated and available to be populated at some later time. In some cases, it may be desirable to leave half the package terminals unpopulated and provide at least some of the unpopulated terminals in both a left half and a right half of the package. In some cases, it may be desirable to have a boundary between the unpopulated left half of the package and the unpopulated right half of the package. In some cases, it may be desirable to have a populated left half and a populated right half of the package, where these halves of the package are connected to two different circuits that are coupled together at later times. One approach to this issue has been to “zone” the IC package to prevent any more terminals on one side of an “X” defined by the bonded solder mask from being populated than on the other side of the “X.” However, this approach can result in zonal placement of the IC package, which is undesirable in some cases. Another approach has been to add a ground plane and use it as a “communication channel” between the IC package and the PCB or other substrate. This approach presents several limitations. First, it cannot be used to communicate one circuit to another circuit in different halves of the IC package. Second, it consumes a lot of space within the package, thus reducing the number of terminals that can be disposed within the package. For these and other reasons, there is a need for the present invention. The effect of maturation on the lamellar bodies of medullary thick ascending

Fly Tipping Fly-tipping, also known as "dump-tip" or "fly-dumping", is the illegal dumping of hazardous waste, trash, or other litter by individuals, who often leave behind the message "Do your bit. Plastic bags only" or "Tire your car. Carry a recycle bag". These bottles and bags are placed over or under streets, or in car parks, or in waterways. All four local authorities (North Yorkshire, York, Rotherham and Sheffield) treat fly-tipping as a waste crime. There are also various environmental charity groups, as well as many websites, which work to stop the activity. The number of incidents is difficult to track, with estimates of 200,000 a year in the UK. In 2017 Environment Agency England and Wales carried out investigations into around 175,000 dump sites and found more than 2,100 fly-tipping offences. In the United States, fly-tipping is generally prohibited and could result in serious criminal penalties. The term "fly-tipping" also suggests that the waste is dropped, or blown into the air, by a conventional aircraft, but this is by no means always the case.
