The present study focuses on the process of integrating counselling into an individual's life, with a view to improving the therapy process. Twelve counsellors and their clients, all of whom received psychotherapy at a city centre department of psychiatry, discussed 120 life history items over six sessions. The study concerned itself primarily with the clients' post-therapy persistence, rather than with the therapy itself, since client and therapist agree that these would be areas of greatest potential for unravelling therapy. A hierarchical process model was proposed to account for the observed interindividual differences in client persistence. The three factors identified as being significant determinants of persistence were conceptual demands, the client's personality, and the counsellor's personality and background beliefs. The first two factors were shown to be closely interrelated, particularly in situations of conceptual difficulty. The findings of the study emphasize the value of counsellor training in conceptual understanding and supportive approach. Implications for training are discussed, including the suggestions that the counsellor's personality and background beliefs need to be taken into account.

Hi, I have a 1996 Honda Civic DX. I have checked the manual, but I am having trouble finding the information I need. I am trying to find out about head gasket changes and removal/replacement, a diagram showing the diagram of the oil pan and any other diagrams that may help me with this. I was wondering if anyone had found a schematic or service manual for the 1992-1995
