Theresa May has been accused of defying her government's "medieval" welfare sanctions regime by allowing people to get free healthcare, free bus passes, housing and discounts on utilities by working for zero hours contracts, The Independent has learned. Ministers insist the sanctions regime - designed to stop people claiming benefits - is no longer the barrier they once were, and the Prime Minister has insisted publicly that people cannot "hide" behind the new rules. But new figures reveal that nearly 700,000 people claiming benefits - up from just 31,000 in 2012 - could be affected by the Labour government's changes to the benefits system after the election. The shock findings were revealed after a Freedom of Information Act request for information on zero hours contracts
