They have even done better than dogs by also being solitary. Still, cats have had to adapt to other people's environments and human technologies, and so they end up adapting better to our world than we do, at least in part, as illustrated by the trend of them supplanting their smaller, more insect-eating counterparts as the top predator. Technically speaking, this is the Great Predator Shift. That is, over the past 15 million years or so, as the human population boomed, cats supplanted viverrid carnivores (rabbits, pangolins, and so on) as the superpredators (taking into account estimated body mass). This means that cats are both more numerous and, increasingly, more dangerous in human worlds. The question is, why? In order to answer this, we first need to know a little bit about the ecology and relative vulnerabilities of large mammals. Using the term "vulnerable" here, though, is a bit vague because to say that something is vulnerable means that it is in some way threatened by another entity or class of entities. Most vulnerable are species that will normally survive in the absence of another predator, but this can't be the sole condition of vulnerability, because there are other predators besides cats. What I mean
