What's New in the?

Military strategic studies during the Twentieth Century have tended to focus on the major conflicts and inter-war periods between great powers – Germany, Italy, Japan, United States, Britain, France – and then on the Cold War between the superpowers – America and the Soviet Union. In this period, the wars and military exploits of the likes of King Frederick, Italy's Mussolini and the Japanese militarists were almost entirely ignored and the conflict between Germany and Russia was regarded more as a case of simmering hostility than a war of imperial expansion and conquest. War in the Arctic, meanwhile, had been largely left out of the picture. During the 1920s, the Soviets appeared to be gaining the upper hand in European conflict. The Russian Revolution of 1917 had inspired the French, the Germans and the British to challenge their rule. The Kremlin was supported by a tight circle of close friends and allies – Poland, Latvia, Lithuania, Finland, Estonia and eventually, in the 1930s, Finland. The USSR was also seen as the natural ally of the United States, which had helped to promote the Russian revolution. Indeed, to a large extent the United States built the Red Army during the 1920s and it was a natural ally of Stalin. In Germany too, the Soviets were seen as a natural support for the leftist forces of the Social Democrats and Communists. In 1928, an American journalist visiting Germany declared that the Soviet presence in Europe was 'a menace to the peace of the world.' In 1936, the First World War veteran and US Senator from Wisconsin, Claude Swanson, argued that Stalin's regime could not be tolerated. In the early 1930s, the Soviet Union openly attempted to extend its influence across the Baltic, occupying Latvia and Estonia. In response, Britain and France announced plans to build a joint air base in Iceland, from which they hoped to counter Soviet aggression in the region by bombing the USSR. The Soviets responded to the air base scheme by aiding the Nazi Party in Germany's successful seizure of power in 1933. The country that was seen as the natural ally of the United States, the country ruled by a tyrant who murdered millions of people in his own country in the course of suppressing domestic rebellion, became the enemy. In 1933, a crisis broke out in East Asia. China and Japan formed a tenuous alliance and then signed an unequal treaty, which acknowledged the Japanese sphere of influence across a large part of China. Germany and Japan were allies and in October 1936,
