$( 'td' ).click( function() {
    $( this ).find( 'td' ).removeClass( 'selected' );
    $( this ).addClass( 'selected' ); } );

The problem is that the color is changed only on the first row.

I've tried several things like this :

$( 'td' ).click( function() {
    $( this ).siblings( 'td' ).removeClass( 'selected' );
    $( this ).siblings().addClass( 'selected' ); } ); //or
$( 'td' ).click( function() {
    $( this ).parent().find( 'td' ).removeClass( 'selected' );
    $( this ).parent().find( 'td' ).addClass( 'selected' ); } );

I think I'm missing something simple here, any idea? Thanks for your help! A: Your code works but you can't use this to find a parent. You should use this as a parameter on the selector you are targeting. $(this) will find the td element in the

    $( this ).parent().siblings().addClass( 'selected' ); } );

I configured the input as one hour in advance and set it to trigger at every 2 seconds and to send an email at every 6 hours. But it seems every 2 seconds, it is triggering a new email. What could cause this?

A: After you setup a logic app, you will get multiple of API server websocket events, including the connection/disconnection. you can use the Event Grid Connector, you will get more details from your Logic app. And you can add the trigger or the variable to it using the alertaction, and you will get different event type. The order will be; your logic app trigger or variable your logic app parameter the connection event the disconnection event If you have the actual worker in code, you can use the receiveactivity to get the actual worker that is executing the logic app.

Q: jQuery Ajax when to call ready()? When should one call $.ajax's ready() method? In my code I'm using it, but I'm a little hesitant about it. My library contains a class called Selector which extends Element and also a namespace of Function which my library is basically a wrapper for jQuery. When I use $.ajax, should I still call ready()? Other libraries sometimes only target the global jQuery object, but that's just because they don't need to scope to an individual function. If it's a shared library, shouldn't a function's scope just naturally encompass the variable it is declared in? A: It depends on what you're trying to accomplish. If your library simply provides the ability to call $.ajax, and not anything related to DOM elements, then I would just include
