Most of these are just thought, and have not yet been proven or observed to be true. If you've got any in mind, please add them to the list and I'll revise the list accordingly. Now, these are practical aspects to use of a computer: A method to access Internet. A method to store information. A method to control peripherals. But there are also more important aspects that affect your use of a computer: A method to store data. A method to communicate. A method to prove a point. If you want to completely avoid an Internet connection to the computer, and just want to do everything through the computer itself, then you might as well not even call it a computer anymore. Your computer will be a lot more convenient if it does have Internet access. You can upload pictures to a website, share documents, send e-mail, make a call, search for information, etc. If you want to completely avoid using a computer to communicate, then you'd be better off using a typewriter or a pencil and paper. You don't have to worry about viruses, or "malware" (malicious software), or spam e-mail. You don't have to worry about having to file your taxes, or punch your time card, or check your e-mail, or even your bank account online. You don't have to worry about losing valuable information, like your password, your documents, or your pictures. If you want to completely avoid using a computer to prove a point, then you'd be better off writing on a page of paper, or using a chalkboard.

There's no Internet involved, so no potential viruses, and your computer isn't sending e-mails or searching for information. There's no money involved, so there's no need to file your taxes, or buy a "secure" credit card. You can pretend there's no after-hours job, because you can't tell a coworker "Hey, can I show you something I printed out from my computer?" The only things you'll have to worry about are finding paper, and erasing the chalkboard. For all the reasons listed above, I'd use a computer for anything and everything, except for the last few (see more about that at the bottom of this page). A: Insecticides Before computer proliferation, pesticides were a big problem. While no pesticides are good or bad (they do affect the
