And it's at a G20 meeting which focuses on global economic issues and "critical" global protection for nature, that the UK's economy was even discussed at all. The meeting was being held in the Australian city of Brisbane, an iconic city that will host the next G20. It was a gathering of the world's 20 most important economic powers, and it ended in agreement on the need to ensure the UK has a seat at the table. Among the big debates: big oil and coal versus clean energy; structural changes to the financial sector and banking; and tax evasion. Representatives of the UK's Department of Business, Energy and Industrial Strategy was there, listening and learning. Its head of the Environment and Energy Regulation, Frances Moore, said: "It's clearly an incredible thing to have someone like me at a G20 with you. "It shows that governments are coming to grips with these issues. "We're very much engaged in the agenda - what we're talking about here is critical issues for the UK and I want to know what we can do in partnership with the Australian government to make sure the UK is at the table." Leading industrialist and former economics minister, Lord Mandelson is happy with the UK's position. He said: "This is a very important meeting for the world's most powerful economies and I'm so pleased that the UK has been admitted to it. It shows that our influence and engagement is increasingly important." But UK Trade Minister Lord Drayson said there was a danger that the UK will be too soft. "There may be some justified criticism that we come into this and we're not pitching for very much. "We are not looking for a deal at the top table; we are looking to do our best, which is in this region of the world, to make sure we're delivering for our industry and exporting into the region as well." The UK has fallen behind its European rivals in the area of sustainable energy and climate change
