I'll give a few more details to clarify what I'm asking. Consider a nucleus of  $^{59}\text{Fe} + ^{59}\text{Fe} \rightarrow 2\ ^{59}\text{Ni}$ . The nucleus has a half-life of 660 days, and the proton can only decay into neutrons. If I want to form  $^{58}\text{Ni}$ , what is the simplest way? I'm imagining it could be done with a high number of protons. It seems to me that protons are a plentiful source of neutrons. I'm not a nuclear physicist, so I'd love to know if there are any other things that might be more effective than proton decay, such as neutron absorption. A: I'm not an expert, but off the top of my head, it looks like the magic number is 10. You should get roughly 10 neutrons per reaction. If you have a pile of  $^{58}\text{Fe}$  and  $^{59}\text{Fe}$  and just want to get  $^{58}\text{Ni}$  you need to add enough neutrons to get 10. 10 neutrons are just 1/10 of the neutrons for the  $^{59}\text{Fe}$  and you get 2  $^{58}\text{Ni}$  that way. (so not exact) Adding 10 more of those, giving you 60 neutrons, will get you 16  $^{58}\text{Ni}$ . Another option is that  $^{58}\text{Fe}$  has a huge neutron affinity (2.6 eV) and is a much better neutron absorber than  $^{59}\text{Fe}$  (0.76 eV). So, if you have that much as a buildup, you should pick up free neutrons at a rate of about 2 neutrons per second. So if you have a lot of  $^{58}\text{Fe}$  (not 59 or 60, but I think 56
