Metabolism of the neurotoxin 1-methyl-4-phenylpyridinium and its relevance to Parkinson's disease. The unique ability to detect increased cerebral concentrations of 1-methyl-4-phenylpyridinium (MPP+) in living patients with Parkinson's disease has led to the possibility that it might be a direct toxin to neurons. However, it has also been suggested that it is an intermediary metabolite in the dopamine-mediated pathway to neurotoxicity. This paper reviews the evidence that 1) MPP+ can be taken up by dopaminergic neurons and exists in them for some time, 2) MPP+ is oxidized by mitochondrial dehydrogenases, 3) the catechol to pyridinium metabolite 3,4-dihydroxyphenylacetic acid is formed from the mitochondrial oxidation of dopamine, 4) the enzyme which forms MPP+ (MAO) and the 3-monoamine oxidase enzyme which metabolizes MPP+ are present in the dopaminergic neurons, and 5) MPP+ can be used as a substrate for the enzyme glutathione S-transferase. This paper also reviews the evidence that, although MPP+ can be taken up by the dopaminergic neurons, it is not extensively metabolized by them. Metabolism is mainly in glial cells and is to nitric oxide and free radicals. MPP+ is also rapidly transported out of brain cells into cerebral spinal fluid. These results are consistent with the hypothesis that MPP+ is an intra-neuronal toxin.
