To the west is Crawley Down and to the east is Crawley's rural fringes. It is south of London, north-east of Gatwick, and south-west of Brighton. In the 2001 census, Wrigley Heath had a population of 5,148 people living in 2,595 households. Although Wrigley Heath is in the east of Crawley, with its northern and western boundaries defined by the M23 motorway, it is no longer contiguous with Crawley. The eastern boundary was once defined by the River Arun, but this has now been completely replaced by the M23 motorway, and part of Wrigley Heath has now been incorporated into the nearby suburb of Crawley Down. Wrigley Heath was historically a smaller suburb of Crawley as it was not developed until the 1950s. The

Tor Browser 8.5.0 - garry ===== 0x0 Last I remember, Tor Browser was more a testbed for new Tor ideas than a consistent stable release. Is that still the case? In contrast, I find that before the most recent Tor Browser releases, [describes "Tor Browser 5.5.x (released December 2018)" as having "more than fifty security and privacy improvements". And it appears that the current Tor Browser builds from 2019 are only for Linux. ~~~ gvb The primary userbase

The problem is that if I run : G.layout_by_remoteness(g) for a graph where each node has weight 1, it give the following output: (('d2', 0), ('c1', 1), ('a1', 1), ('a2', 1)) (('c2', 1), ('d1', 1), ('b1', 1), ('b2', 1)) It seems that the method have issues that cause a reordering of the nodes, while this is not desired. Is there a way to solve this? A: The reason why this issue is not a bug is that layout_by_remoteness() simply rearranges the nodes based on a comparison between the edge weights of each node. If weights are equal, a random order is given to the nodes. In fact, this seems a reasonable way to layout a graph, if you don't care about the order. However, if you want the nodes to be ordered as in the original graph, you have to return a new graph object that carries out the original layout via networkX. This is easy
