It is known, particularly from the U.S. Pat. No. 5,476,187, to manufacture a combustion chamber liner of a rocket motor in that a rocket motor support structure, which encompasses the combustion chamber liner, is fabricated and that, before the combustion chamber liner is attached to the rocket motor support structure, the latter is also equipped with supporting elements for the combustion chamber liner. The supporting elements are later connected to the rocket motor support structure by means of a spacer. The manufacturing technique thus yields a combustion chamber liner which consists of a core which in turn consists of a plurality of individual segments in each of which, however, a circumferential groove is defined. These grooves are to accept the shims of the supporting elements which are subsequently disposed in the circumferential grooves of the individual segments in the combustion
