[...] My point is that it isn't as easy as a couple of simple windows commands to pull that off. I'd call that "sloppy," or "low effort" security measures. For one, the license server has no way of checking validity (e.g., the user can just generate a new key). You could also generate a key on the license server, but that would make it vulnerable to attacks like the ones described above (which can easily happen if the license server is compromised, or if sensitive information is leaked). Even if you manage to remove the need for a license key, it doesn't mean you have to harden your systems. For example, an attacker could easily just create a valid license key and use it (which you just deleted). Keep in mind that it is easier for an attacker to create a valid license key than it is to exploit your system or steal valid credentials, so you still have a problem on your hands. In terms of cybersecurity, an actual license key is just a second layer of security, meaning that you are still far from being impenetrable. In an attack scenario where your license server is compromised, there is nothing you can do to guarantee that your system is not affected. If you would harden your system, you would be making the compromise of your license server a lot more difficult. Note that even if it is sufficient to harden your system, you shouldn't use a license key for sensitive data. Using a license key as an authentication method is fine (and I've already shown a viable method of doing so), but use it for things like SSL certificates or sensitive information is a mistake, at least until you have a good reason why you need to do so. A: I am the software developer behind SecureCRT. I can answer your questions as follows: The license server cannot check validity of the license. Licenses can be generated and inserted into the licenses database but that doesn't mean they are valid. Validity should be checked by the server. A normal license key can be generated and used on the device being licensed. A license key is unique and identifies a user. Unlike normal license keys, a license key cannot be generated on the device. This is so the license key can't be cloned or otherwise be created multiple times and by multiple users. The "license server" is actually the licenses database. Each device is licensed individually. A license key is used d0c515b9f4
