The problem is that the inverse function can't be found without using double values, so I've got to create a generic function that can find the inverse at different precision, somehow. This is my arc-tangent function: public static double az (double a, double b, double θ) { return Math.tan(Math.asin(Math.abs(b)) * Math.abs(a) * Math.cos(Math.toDegrees(θ))); } So I tried creating a function that took several arguments and the θ (in radians), and it was able to find the inverse function, but only for a very low precision. static double inverseArcTan(double a, double b, double θ) { double x, y; double r = Math.tan(Math.asin(Math.abs(b)) * Math.abs(a) * Math.cos(Math.toDegrees(θ))); x = r * Math.abs(a); y = Math.pow(Math.abs(x), 1.0 / 2.0); return Math.asin(y * Math.sqrt(1.0 - Math.pow(b, 2.0) * y)); } If I take a precision between 1e-8 and 1e-5, for example, the function returns 0.0 as a result. For higher precisions, it's just returning 0.0 and increasing x has no effect, not even when the values are twice the initial ones. My question is, is there some way I can make this function more

Tinted lenses are cosmetic lenses that give the wearer of spectacles a pleasant view when looking at distant objects through the lens. The tint is fixed and does not provide a color change depending on the ambient light. The tint is a color that is clearly distinguishable from the tint of the spectacle lens for better contrast when the wearer is at a distance from the person wearing the lenses. In the prior art, the tint is only indicated by eye chart words, dots or letters that are printed on the lenses. Biosensors are of interest in detecting diseases of the eye. These sensors are currently limited in their choice of operating range and response time. Early eye disease often occurs during growth of the eye, for example in the childhood years. Hence, detection of children's eye diseases, for example, keratoconjunctivitis sicca (KCS), has been made easier. KCS is also known as xerophthalmia. KCS is also know as a dry eye disease that is characterized by defective tear production due to insufficient tear secretion resulting in the loss of tears from the eyes. If the tears are not supplemented, the wetting of the ocular surface is limited, and the damage that is caused, such as irritation of the eye or loss of vision, is substantial. Adults may also be affected by KCS, for example, if they are extremely old. In this case, the tear
