But the resolution of the BSE crisis must be guided by a utilitarian rationality, says Sanjay Chakravarti. The United States may be losing its cachet as the world's economic superpower to China and many other developing countries. But its clout in the fields of diplomacy and international cooperation are increasing. Neither the United Nations nor the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) would have shrunk in importance if it had not had the fifth largest economy in the world under its wings. While the international community had already taken note of US's effort to promote green technologies, the new US president is making an effort to tighten US's embrace of green policies. US President Donald Trump had announced his determination to leave behind "fossil fuels" in his earlier campaign speeches. This was coupled with the appointment of pro-clean energy figures like Rex Tillerson (after a 64-year long change of guards in the top job of the oil company) to the US Secretary of State post, and the announcement of fossil fuel subsidies to be cut across the world by 2% of global GDP. The incoming Trump administration and his nomination of figures with
