Four patients with proliferative ocular diseases, including keratitis (n = 2) and uveitis (n = 2) as well as one patient with marginal keratitis, developed proliferative keratitis that was refractory to standard treatments. Among various drugs administered systemically, intravenous cyclosporine was tried in 3 of the 4 cases. Although no improvement could be obtained in 1 of them, partial regression of the infiltrates was noted in the other 2. To our knowledge, this is the first report of the successful administration of cyclosporine in proliferative ocular diseases, including keratitis. Therefore, we suggest that intravenous cyclosporine may be useful in the treatment of refractory proliferative keratitis. A four-week in-office biodegradation trial of a subcutaneous collagen matrix in a 12-year-old female patient with a mass on her left calf. Conventional treatment of soft tissue tumors is often unsatisfactory and includes extensive surgery. We present a 12-year-old female patient with a slow growing tumour on the left calf. The tumor had previously not been removed and extended to the skin of the calf. It was benign, well-vascularized and appeared as a regular and firm mass. There were no symptoms or signs of infection. The tumour was located in a strategically important region for the patient (coffin-lung syndrome). Transplantation of a dermal substitute in this region would be burdened with significant risks and would not have been accepted by the patient's family. The patient received a subcutaneous injection of a collagen matrix, which was left in place for 4 weeks to biodegrade into the dermis. The patient's symptoms disappeared after a few days and there were no signs of infection. The wound was closed with a non-absorbable suture and a dressing was applied.Q: How to write 595f342e71
