best known of the short-recoil system of recoil operated guns in the late 1800s and early 1900s.
The gun in which he became most famous was the Model 21 revolver, an excellent and very reliable small bore .22LR handgun chambered for the powerful new .22LR cartridge invented by Samuel Colt. The Model 21 is still manufactured today, but it is no longer being produced by its original manufacturer, the Browning Arms Company.
Browning Arms has recently changed their name to Fulton Armory and Fulton Armory still sells the Model 21, but they no longer manufacture the revolver. I have been asked by at least half a dozen gun owners if I know someone who would be willing to transfer a still viable Model 21 revolver to me. The Model 21 is still very affordable, and the question is how much a warranty can they give an old gun? I started writing up what I thought was the best answer, but unfortunately I don't have any actual experience working for a large gun maker to back up what I would have said. So I am going to give it a try here with you and your readers. First, it is important to understand what the warranty does for a revolver. According to this warranty on Browning Arms Model 21 guns, the gun is covered for 2 years against all manufacturing defects (for parts and finish), and a 10 year warranty against all mechanical defects, including breaks in the frame and trigger safety. We also note that the warranty doesn't cover "defects due to careless operation". The break in the frame of a Browning Model 21 is a very common occurrence. To understand why it is so common, simply put the gun down on a hard surface in a way that causes the frame to break, and then pick it up. A Model 21 break in the frame is a very common occurrence. In the meantime, the trigger safety on a Browning Model 21 is actually inside the trigger, and is in fact
