Threedimensional colloidal crystal hydrogel for mechanically robust and biocompatible composite hydrogels. Composite hydrogels by integration of a polymer matrix and a colloidal crystal (CC) are receiving increasing interest for biomimetic studies and functional scaffolds. In this study, we demonstrate the feasibility of such a composite hydrogel, by combining the well-established photocrosslinking method with a periodic organization of CC. A porous matrix of spherical particles of polyacrylamide (PAM) was prepared by copolymerization of the monomer and its crosslinker. Subsequently, the CC was formed by an in situ precipitation process of a nanoporous silica layer and a subsequent mineralization process of the encapsulated polyacrylic acid (PAA). Finally, a CC structure was transformed into a soft and rubbery composite hydrogel by photocrosslinking of PAA. The mechanical properties of this composite were characterized, and the influence of the CC and its mechanical properties on the properties of the composite was assessed. In addition, the biocompatibility of the composite was determined. The prepared composite hydrogel is very robust, showing that it can withstand both the swelling behaviour of its matrix and the swelling of an aqueous medium. The hydrogel also retains its mechanical properties upon external stimuli and has high biocompatibility. These properties make this composite hydrogel an attractive alternative to other 2D and 3D composites, including natural and synthetic materials, for applications in various fields, such as tissue engineering, synthetic biology, and biofuel cells.Determination of the antidepressant activity of some 3,4-diaryl-3-hydroxymethyl-1-methyl-2-pyrazolin-5-ones. The antidepressant activity of the synthesized 3,4-diaryl-3-hydroxymethyl-1-methyl-2-pyrazolin-5-ones in the forced swimming test has been investigated. The compounds were administered orally and intraperitoneally, as single doses, to male Wistar rats weighing about 180 g. Some compounds showed antidepressant activity after oral administration, but the compounds

Addition of rat liver DNA to the lymphocyte cultures results in the appearance of DNase I-resistant DNA containing 2'-deoxyadenosine (dA) at many DNA regions. The isolated 2'-deoxyadenosine-containing DNA exhibits a labeled band in polyacrylamide gels and an increase in the level of incorporation of 3H-dTTP into lymphocyte DNA in the presence of DNA as compared to the control in the absence of DNA. In polyacrylamide gels, the undecamer containing two or more dA residues migrates with a molecular size that is intermediate to a ladder made up of 16 and 30 bp oligomers made of dA residues. The labeled bands represent the DNA regions containing dA residues. No difference is seen in the oligomer content of 3H-dTTP incorporated in DNA of lymphocytes incubated with and without DNA. These results indicate that DNA stimulators, available in the form of extracellular DNA in vitro, play a role in gene regulation and the control of proliferation by altering the pattern of 2'-deoxyadenosine residues in the DNA of stimulated cells..e. in a refrigerator). The shock of the cold air directly entering the eye can cause blurry vision, temporary vision problems or permanent damage if not treated immediately.
