Effect of two carbon adsorption changes on zinc redox potential and mineralization processes in contaminated soil. This paper studied the changes in zinc (Zn) redox potential and Zn mineralization in the presence of different carbon adsorption conditions of soil. Based on the results, we concluded that two types of carbon including three different carbon adsorption conditions (Kaolin, Coal (US coal), and Peat) had significant effects on the adsorption and desorption capacities of Zn on soil, especially on large-sized mineral particles with a pH of 3.5 or less. When the soil was mixed with the previously desorbed soil sample, the pH of the Zn solution decreased as the desorption time increased. The clay mineral adsorbed Zn due to its relatively small size (200-850 nm) and larger specific surface area, and this adsorption was reduced by the presence of large-sized mineral particles (300-500 microm), which resulted in a decreasing pH and a positively charging surface of the soil. Adsorbed Zn was desorbed by reducing the pH to 3.0 to 3.5 during mixing the soil sample in distilled water, and Zn(OH)<sub>2</sub> formed and precipitated as secondary mineral (Zn<sup>2+</sup>). Adsorption of Zn to the organic layer of soil (including peat) caused desorption of Zn and mineralization of organic matter in soil.
