A Bitcoin Bumper Boy was hit by a train in Sweden, triggering a small fire and leaving its "snow white" head cut off. The boy, believed to be six, was sitting on a 7.2 metre (23 ft) long and three-metre high London Underground train platform on Sunday morning when he was knocked off. He was wearing a helmet but the helmet had no wires and the boy was killed instantly. He fell next to the tracks and a train came along at the speed of approximately 68km per hour (43mph) to the platform where he lay. Witnesses, including at least one other child, had seen him drop off the platform, fall on the tracks and appear to be dead before the train hit him. Videos of the accident

appear to show that the train came along so quickly that there was little time to react. One shows a man who has an officer of the railways by his side running towards the child, while shouting, and another shows a group of rail workers running out of the station to look on. The boy was hit by the train about a metre above the platform and his head was severed as the top of the train cut through it. His body and helmet were lying on the platform, while his head was on the tracks. The child's parents, who said they were travelling through Britain on holiday, reported their son missing after they arrived at his school in the city of Kristianstad in northern Sweden. The boy's body was in the school until a relative came to pick it up, the BBC reports. The train driver and two other people on the platform fled after the collision and later said they heard the child scream. Gaby Bodil Jørgensen, who filmed the accident and posted the footage online, tweeted that she had asked a ticket inspector why the boy hadn't been taken off the platform by someone and been taken to hospital to be treated. "He answered it is really not our job, there is too much work here to do, and that we need to hurry to the next station," she wrote in a tweet. It is not known who was responsible for the boy's death. A report into the accident is
