Fifa 22 Full Version

PLAYER PROFILE Marek Mintál Age: 28 Position: Left-back Nation: Slovakia Club: FK Bodova International: 78 caps for Slovakia Marek Mintál will be the first name on the teamsheet when the new FIFA comes out, and I think that's a mistake. He's had some good performances - in particular for Cruzeiro against Manchester United - but he's often been out of the team and it hasn't helped that Cruzeiro have basically been playing a 4-2-3-1 formation. He's a guy who knows the whole width of the pitch and knows exactly where to go when he wants to make a run, but the system he's been playing in has been playing into the hands of his opponents. I'm sure he'll still get his chance because of the quality he has shown in the past, but he's definitely not my choice for the four starting spots. My favourite players: Edin Dzeko - high-energy striker who is always good for a goal and a great finisher (although I prefer a young Iago Aspas for that) Paul Pogba - powerful midfielder with some great dribbling and a tireless worker Michael Carrick - great midfielder with energy and some experience Aaron Ramsey - a very good player who should really be getting more games to make up for some bad luck with injuries in the past Romelu Lukaku - will take chances that no one else would Striker duos Ronaldo + Messi - Ronaldo is the natural goalscorer but don't underestimate Messi; he's the greatest player the world has ever seen Robert Lewandowski + Michu - Lewandowski is the main striker but he's not the player you'd place your hopes on to put the ball in the back of the net all of the time Cristiano Ronaldo + Paulo Dybala - Dybala is the more creative player but Ronaldo's ability to take the ball past players and finish is unique Lionel Messi + Javier Pastore - they play as a pair with the older player pulling the strings Defenders De Gea - THEE

Every Friday, we review a classic board game with a modern twist. We explore both the theories and history of these fantastic games and try to highlight the modern take on them. Read our other editions of What is? What is? The noughties was a diverse time in board games, with everything from puzzles like Tangle to large strategy games like Settlers of Catan. Now, in this week's What is?, we travel back to the world of classic board games for a look at the rules, development and history of another title that's popped up again and again on eboards and online games over the last decade or so. It's Sushi Go! When I was at university, a friend invited me to an out-of-town convention, and I ended up running a game of Sushi Go! for everyone there. It's a game I'd never really heard of before, but since I was showing off to my new American friends (and learning a lot about fast-casual dining in the US), I thought it would be worth looking up. The game comes from the good people at Castle Games, and today we'll take a look at how Sushi Go! challenges the bad guy strategy of monopoly. A brief history of Sushi Go! Sushi Go! was originally published by the very neat and very small British games company, GameLoft. GameLoft was founded by James Brown in 2005, and the company grew out of his first venture into indie game publishing: Langoliers. This is a game about insect-eating, and as the title suggests, it takes place in a kitchen. Langoliers was a little box full of flimsy plastic cabinets and rolling counters, and the kitchen itself was a collection of random appliances and islands in an office. But Langoliers had a pretty cool kitchen. You got up close and personal with the action, and it certainly helped set the tone. It was a game where you'd be given a couple of plates and a knife and a bit of advice from your foul-mouthed cat-husband (which included a potty-training tip), and then you'd go to work in the confines of a man-size box, gathering ingredients, chopping them up and stirring all in the name of freshness and efficiency. Sushi Go! the modern version of Langoliers It only took James
