A: I think the issue comes from when you are creating your HashMap it creates a map with a default constructor and in your loop you are filling the hashmap so it has to re-initialize the map with the default constructor and that is why your getters and setters are not working as their hashmap doesn't contain a key called email change your setup from HashMap m = new HashMap(); to HashMap m = new HashMap(); The reason is you are initializing the map with a constructor that does not have an key and when you are getting the object out of this map you are not getting the key. So since the map has no key, by default the getters and setters are not called. You can verify this by printing the hashcode of the hashmap and you will see that it's zero and so it calls the getters or setters Q: Use COUNT in a sum() function I Solutions Manual for Statistics for Business. Catecholamine-containing cells in the striatum of the fetal rat: an immunohistochemical study. The present paper reports the presence of catecholamines in the basal ganglia of fetal (17-18 days gestation) Sprague-Dawley rats. An immunohistochemical study with antibodies against tyrosine hydroxylase and dopamine-beta-hydroxylase was performed to localize catecholamine-containing neurons.

Microphotographs of the developing staining pattern demonstrated the presence of catecholamine-containing neurons even at 17-18 days gestation and the disappearance of the catecholamine phenotype by Day 20.

Microphotographs of the immunostained sections revealed a dense plexus of tyrosine hydroxylase-containing fibers and scattered varicose fibers. Fibers showing a dense catecholamine fluorescence were also observed. These morphological characteristics suggest that catecholamines in the fetal rat basal ganglia are most likely originating from projections of the ventral mesencephalic neurons. The confocal microscopy study of serial sections of the rostral portion of the rostral brainstem revealed a variety of catecholaminecontaining neurons in the ventral portion of
