Making custom brushes Although Photoshop Elements provides a large library of custom brushes, it's much easier to start with something simple and move from there. Let's start making a custom brush by taking one of your own photos and adding some effects. To do this, first we'll need a single layer. To create a layer, open up a new document, click on the Layer Style icon in the bottom-left, and select Layer from the dropdown. Then click OK to create a new layer. Next, we'll use the Quick Selection tool (black arrow) in the Photoshop toolbar to select the left side of the flower. You can also use the Layer » Lock » Move tool to move the layer, so you can manipulate both sides of the flower. Now, let's add a new brush. Select Create Brush (black arrow) from the Brushes panel (Window menu). At the bottom of the panel, you should see a list of all the brushes you have and a button to load your own brushes. Click this button to load a different brush template, or select one of the brushes that comes with Photoshop Elements. Once the brush is loaded, look for the name of the brush in the Brush menu (Window menu). The name of your brush will appear under the Brushes category. The Create brush will be the very first brush in the list. You can edit the brush by right-clicking on it to bring up the options. You can also go to the Brush Preset Manager (Window menu) to change the settings or replace the brush with another brush in the Photoshop library. To replace the current brush with a brush you've made yourself, go to the Brush Preset Manager (Window menu). Now, let's go through each of the options that will be displayed when you right
