

The objective of "HyperMotion Technology" is to create a more lifelike and authentic football experience. When we say more lifelike, we mean more like the real-life players experience it. One of the key elements of "HyperMotion Technology" is the player concept. The player concept is based on real-life player movements, sizes, strengths and skillsets. Alignment with FIFA's new player-controlled animations is an important feature. Specifically, we've made several upgrades in particular areas, including: - Down to the game's animations. FIFA feels and responds more like you want it to. For instance, animations now apply to the player's movement, in-game passes, in-game kicks and in-game positioning. - Goalkeepers are now more aggressive in making saves during attacks, and the net will now block and deflect shots more realistically. - Player-controlled animations make it easier and more authentic to tackle, cut, win possession and run with the ball. - Player-controlled animations make it easier and more authentic to do a "header." Increased control over the game is also included, such as more precise passes, stronger defensive reads, more accurate shooting, quicker sprints and faster combinations between players. The development team, led by Technical Director Alex Allix, thought carefully about how to better represent the game's best players in in-game decision-making, as well as how they'll feel and think about how to approach game play and how to control the ball. For the first time in the series, FIFA introduces camera-controls. From the player's perspective, camera control is easier to use, faster and more natural. Video shows how camera control will work in FIFA 22. We're also introducing a new player direction, which is used to indicate to the defensive AI that an attacking player is moving into space. The player direction displays on the player's HUD for defenders as well as the AI, and also displays on the pitch HUD. Here are some more of the innovations introduced in "HyperMotion Technology." Movement Capture Using data from real players in full match conditions, we used 22 NBA players on stage during gameplay testing to record their movements. We then use this data to drive the movements of all the players on the pitch during gameplay. Movement data is recorded using "body-mounted motion
