It's where visitors begin their tour. It's also the place where visitors typically go to search for content or features. Conventionally, an application for controlling access to content stored in a server (content control server) from a client has been frequently employed. For example, such a content control application is described in Patent Document 1. The above-mentioned content control application allows a client to access only content that the client is allowed to access. Here, access from the client to the content is limited to an access from the client to a content control server. The content control application is employed when the content stored in the server is restricted such that the user is allowed to access the content only if the user is an authorized user. In this case, in order to meet the user requirement, the content stored in the server is restricted such that the authorized user is allowed to access the content, but the unauthorized user is not allowed to access the content. Here, a client-server model is used, and the client requests the server for access to the content stored in the server. However, the client does not have information on whether the user requesting access to the content is an authorized user. Thus, whether the user requesting access to the content is an authorized user is not known until the server performs authentication processing on the user. In the authentication processing, the user name and password that can be used for access to the content stored in the server are checked against the user name and password (hereinafter, referred to as the password) that the user has input when the user requests access to the content stored in the server. If any of the user name and password coincide with the input, the user requesting access is determined as an authorized user. Further, if the user requesting access is determined as an authorized user, a session key is generated for encrypting and decrypting content transmitted from the user. Conventionally, when a session key is generated, an encryption key and a decryption key are independently generated. An encryption key is generated by XORing random numbers. A session key is generated by XORing the encryption key with random numbers. [Patent Document 1] Japanese Patent Application Laid-Open No. 2002-34 b7e8fd5c8
