intentionally sabotages their own company, to get revenge against the firm that fired them, who they see as being harsh or unfair. They're eager to start causing problems as soon as possible. These employees are usually demoralized, isolated and antisocial. Ex iter: This type of stalking can happen when an employee is content at the company they're currently at and has no plans to leave. They go about their job until they suddenly leave the company, usually overnight. This can be a testament to a new project, a promotion or an executive decision that doesn't go over well with the employee.

Those three types of stalking are very similar, but they're subtle in the way they can go about sabotaging a company. They're usually very covert, including having no intention of getting caught.

They may also seem normal, until they start causing issues, and then that's when the sabotage should be looked out for. Why Stalking Is Bad for Your Business Stalking and sabotage can severely damage a company's reputation. It's damaging because it takes away from your business's image and can impact your public image and overall brand. Employee stalking is a very common problem and is a
